

Adorable Kid sends Job Application to NASA

Article By Kelly Baker | 3 years ago

r/funny • milamber • 3d ago

5186 points • 162 comments

An adorable nine-year-old boy has posted a letter to NASA explaining all the reasons why he ought to be hired and immediately too.

The letter, which was shared on the social media board Reddit by a family friend of the child, makes a solid argument and frankly, we reckon NASA should give him the job.

The kid in question is Jack Davis. The gig he is after - NASA's brand new position of Planetary Protector Officer. And seriously, Jack has everything needed to own that role as his letter so clearly states.

"I may be nine but I think I would be fit for the job," writes Jack, who also has a solid referee should NASA need one. Okay, it's his sister. But she reckons Jack is in fact an alien. So you know, he'd be able to communicate with extra-terrestrials no stress at all.

Yours sincerely,

Jack Davis.

Guardian of the Galaxy

Fourth Grade (Year 4)

Let's think about his letter.

That's a handy talent when you're the Planetary Protector Officer. But that's not all - Jack already has a pretty decent background in the field.

"I have seen almost all the space and alien movies I can see," he says.

"I have also seen the show Marvel Agents of Shield and hope to see the movie Men in Black." See? Kid is born for this gig. But wait ... there's more.

"I'm great at video games," he writes. "I am young, so I can learn to think like an Alien."

The writers view....

Give the kid the job! Actually, NASA may well do. The group was so impressed by young Jack's letter of interest it responded in kind.

"It's about protecting Earth from tiny microbes when we bring back samples from the Moon, asteroids and Mars. It's also about protecting other planets and moons from our germs as we responsibly explore the Solar System," wrote James L. Green, director of NASA's planetary science division.

NASA's response letter below.

National Aeronautics and Space Administration

Headquarters

Washington, DC 20546-0001

SMD/Planetary Science Division

Dear Jack,

I hear you are a "Guardian of the Galaxy" and that you're interested in being a NASA Planetary Protection Officer. That's great!

Our Planetary Protection Officer position is really cool and is very important work. It's about protecting Earth from tiny microbes when we bring back samples from the Moon, asteroids and Mars. It's also about protecting other planets and moons from our germs as we responsibly explore the Solar System.

We are always looking for bright future scientists and engineers to help us, so I hope you will study hard and do well in school. We hope to see you here at NASA one of these days!

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in blue ink that reads "James L. Green". The signature is fluid and cursive, with a long horizontal stroke at the end.

Dr. James L. Green
Director, Planetary Science Division